

North East hosts national launch of inquiry into local decision-making

A major national report launched today (Thursday 31 January) by the Commission for Rural Communities (CRC) in Alnwick, Northumberland and in London highlights that nearly half of rural residents feel unable to influence local decisions directly affecting their lives. The report also says just a quarter would look to make contact with their local councillor to seek redress. In contrast, nearly 70% of local councillors believe they are doing a good job. Today's report is the outcome of a national inquiry started in February 2007 into how the role of local councillors can be strengthened.

Commenting on the findings, Mark Shucksmith, Professor of Planning at Newcastle University and a CRC Commissioner said: "I am delighted that the North East region is hosting such an important event, particularly as Alnwick was also the location for an inquiry panel hearing. As a member of the inquiry panel I had the unique opportunity to hear first-hand the views of rural people and their elected representatives from around the country. The government's drive to invest in creating strong and dynamic local leaders is welcome, but, according to our inquiry, councillors and rural people are not properly connecting. And people who do try to connect can be confused about how they should engage with their local councillor.

Professor Shucksmith continued: "If acted upon, the recommendations set out in our report should see citizens more fully engaged in local decision-making, enhance the democratic role for rural communities and create a stronger, more effective voice for local councillors. We are now looking forward to the involvement of stakeholders across the country in helping take forward our findings. We also hope our report will add further momentum to the work of the Councillors' Commission led by Dame Jane Roberts, particularly in relation to those local councillors representing more rural communities."

The key recommendations in the report are:

- central government extending greater trust to both local government parish and town councils (including the new unitary authorities and quality parish councils);
- government should begin to end its council tax capping regime for rural local government (see note 4);
- local government should be supported and encouraged to create neighbourhood budgets and involve local people in spending decisions;
- giving greater powers to Local Strategic Partnerships (for example by providing more flexible means to draw down funds from Regional Development Agencies);
- central government should meet the costs of local elections in all tiers;
- a strong push toward more elections in parish councils rather than co-options;
- the creation of powerful new unitary authorities;
  - a requirement on all councillors to provide an annual report to their constituents;

More...

- Local Strategic Partnerships and their Local Area Agreements, supported by

- central and local government, should clearly commit to supporting parish and market town plans; and
- local government should work with others to put in place ward and parish liaison officers.

David Stewart Chair of the North East Rural Affairs Forum said: "All communities have a right to energetic elected members who will listen to and act on the interests of their constituents. This inquiry report comes at a particularly important time for the north east with unitary authorities just round the corner for Durham and Northumberland. The inquiry set out to determine what makes an effective councillor and to assess if rural communities, like their urban counterparts, are receiving a proper service from elected members. There are some very big challenges ahead for the region's rural communities, for example for those who are remote with marginal economies or those accessible to the cities who are becoming dormitory communities; elected members of all parties have the central role in helping maintain sustainable local communities."

The CRC wants to work with Communities and Local Government in taking these recommendations forward. We want the Local Government Association, National Association of Local Councils and others to continue working with us on this. Immediate opportunities include the government's response to the Councillors' Commissions and the Constitutional Renewal Draft Bill. This is designed to enhance the role of local councillors and devolve more power and resources to a local level.

4. CRC is calling on government to end its council tax capping regime for high performing and small budget local authorities (such as shire district councils), and for authorities using participatory budgeting and referenda based approaches to the level of their council tax. This should be the first step on a path of ending council tax capping altogether – the local authorities' incentive to achieving this goal being enhanced local accountability.
